Where's the Lamb?

Support your local farmers

If you want to be a locovore, someone who buys all your food locally, Solano County makes it easy. You can go straight to the source for your produce and wine, but what about meat? Dixon and the Montezuma Hills are known as lamb country, but where can you buy it?

Just twenty years ago, you could buy a sheep directly from a farmer and send it to one of several local slaughterhouses, but nearly all the family-owned facilities have closed. "Regulatory overhead, compliance costs, economies of scale have made industrial processing more cost effective," said Jim Allan, Solano County Agricultural Commissioner.

Years before the locavore food movement, Solano Land Trust Board President Ian Anderson tried to direct market his lamb. He found that it was too time consuming. Instead, he sells his sheep to Niman Ranch, a high-quality, natural, meat purveyor. If you buy Niman Ranch lamb in summer and autumn, the lamb will be from sheep raised in the Montezuma Hills, either from Anderson's ranch or several others including Jeanne McCormack's, which has a conservation easement held by Solano Land Trust.

Another local lamb product is labeled Superior Farms. Superior Farms in Dixon is the only processing plant west of the Rockies. Superior guarantees that if you buy your lamb locally, the product will be from local sources. (Superior has plants in other states, and the products sold in those states will come from their local sources.)

The era of the direct lamb purchase isn't completely over. If you

Coalition Urges Governor to Restore Funding for the Williamson Act

Nicole Byrd, Executive Director

Solano Land Trust, along with 41 other members of the California Rangeland Conservation Coalition, signed a letter this month urging Governor Schwarzenegger to restore subvention funding (financial assistance) to counties for the Williamson Act.

Historically, Williamson Act funding from the state has helped counties provide tax relief to farmers and ranchers by assessing their land at the agricultural value instead of the developable value, which can be assessed at more than twice as much. In exchange for being taxed at the agricultural value, the farmer or rancher agrees to keep the property in agriculture for ten years. This program provides a strong investment in agriculture and helps keep farmers and ranchers in business by keeping their taxes low.

When the state eliminates subventions to the counties, counties must take on the burden locally. In the current economy when counties are increasingly burdened by the state's massive budget shortfall, taking on Williamson Act subventions may be more than counties can handle over the long term. So far, Solano County Supervisors have supported continued funding for the Williamson Act program; however, it is imperative that the state resume subventions to keep the Williamson Act sustainable over the long term.

The California Rangeland Conservation Coalition, which Solano Land Trust joined in 2009, is an unprecedented group of California ranchers, environmental organizations, and government agencies. Together, these partners are working to preserve private working landscapes, support the long-term viability of the ranching industry, and protect and enhance California rangeland for both legally protected and still-common species. This unique partnership encompasses the expertise of rangeland managers, ecologists, grassland wildlife experts and private ranchers who strongly believe the Williamson Act is intrinsically linked to the coalition's ability to preserve private working rangelands.

Partnership a Win-Win

Solano County takes pride in Lynch Canyon

Lynch Canyon Open Space and the ongoing partnership between Solano County and Solano Land Trust are prominently featured in text and photos in the recently released Solano County 2009 Annual Report. Lynch Canyon is heralded for offering healthy recreation (including a photo and caption on the annual Lynch Canyon Trail Run), community service, and other volunteer opportunities. ## Got Furlough Fridays?

Join us every third Friday for land restoration

Solano Land Trust has several sites where we are working to plant native trees, shrubs, and grasses. Regularly scheduled restoration workdays for volunteers are the third Friday of each month. We would also love to have volunteers join staff on weekday ranch projects or to work independently on projects at Lynch Canyon. These Friday restoration activities are in addition to our regular Saturday workdays.

If you are interested in participating or just want more information contact Sue at Solano Land Trust, (707) 432-0150 x 207 or sue@solanolandtrust.org. These projects are great team-building activities for groups or organizations. We'll supply all the equipment; you need your own boots and gloves. Thank you.

The Poetry of Place

Kids writing on the land

Solano Land Trust partners with Solano Resource Conservation District for environmental education activities on our properties. Monica Cook, a Crystal Middle School student in Linnea Detterman's class, was inspired to write this poem on a field trip to Rush Ranch on November 17, 2009.

The Suisun Marsh

The river shining blue,
As the waves move,
As you hear stillness,
When you keep quiet,
When you see the plants,
Or even the animals
Just enjoy the sight.

As you know nature,
Is the best part of life,
There are tons of places to go,
But if you really love plants
Even animals are clues
This is the best place to go,
The Suisun Marsh.

Lynch Canyon

◦ Solano Land Trust staff were spotted doing restoration work at Lynch Canyon. All staff, including Executive Director Nicole Byrd, were planting native trees and shrubs and installing protective fencing as part of a staff team-building day. Contact us to plan your business team-building project today!

<sup>a</sup>

◦ Mary Beth Crittendon saw a ferruginous hawk, golden eagles, red-tailed hawks, kestrels, and harriers.

<sup>a</sup>

◦ Staff accidentally disturbed four sleepy barn owls along the South Fork Lynch Creek riparian area.

Rush Ranch

◦ Professor Christine Whitcraft visited on a day then the "landscape looked like a child's painting with white puffy clouds, bright blue sky, and green grass." The tides were high and she saw a Suisun shrew.

<sup>a</sup>

◦ Ken Poerner noted that two burrowing owls had taken up residence next to Grizzly Island Road before the first pond fence gate.

<sup>a</sup>

◦ Teri Engbring & Maggie Ingalls saw three kites and a Black and Say's phoebes off South Pasture trail, and Northern harriers near the road north of the stallion barn. They also saw three red-tailed hawks, an American kestrel, and two gorgeous Ferruginous hawks being harassed by a pair of common ravens who wanted their lunch.

Jepson Prairie

◦ Doug Wirtz saw a great-horned owl in the eucalyptus tree near the parking lot.

<sup>a</sup>

◦ Wirtz photographed his first Delta green ground beetle of the season and a single golden violet.
